Keeping your pets safe this Halloween

by Christy Leddy

With the Halloween holiday quickly approaching, there are numerous dangers to our pets surrounding this holiday from xylitol and chocolate toxicities for the over abundance of candy hanging around, to pets becoming scared of costumes and strange noises, to superstitions including those surrounding black cats.

We recommend keeping your veterinarians number handy in case of accidental ingestion of candy or injuries caused by your pet becoming startled or trying to get away. If you feel your pet is in an emergency situation, do not wait to have them seen, a lot of cases like xylitol ingestion can be time sensitive. During trick or treating, keep your pet confined to a quiet room, with a TV on to help drown out some of the unfamiliar sounds. Keep your cats inside, I recommend keeping them inside year round, but especially during the month of October. If you have questions regarding the health or safety of your pet, call your veterinarian, their knowledgeable staff can discuss your pets case in detail with you.

Trinity Goodwin

Meet Trinity

Trinity is a 2 year old Yorkshire Terrier. This little girls colorful grooming is almost as loud and colorful as her personality. Trinity loves coming in to visit Zen Den, she used to come in for moral support for her brother Tritan, but then the doctor told Trinity that she should really shed some pounds, so Trinity began strutting her stuff in the underwater treadmill right beside her brother.

"Thank you to those that joined us at Bark at the Park this year."
